THE HOP CULTURE.

Facts and Figures Regarding the Industry.

WASHINGTON AHEAD

White, Puyallup, Stuck, Skagit and Snohomish Rivers and the Dungeness Bottoms—Mr. Meeker's Experience.—The Cost of Hop Raising in New York and England.

Hop culture in the state of Washington dates from the year 1866, when Jacob R. Meeker, then living about three miles from the site of the present city of Puyallup, planted a peck of hop roots and harvested a bale of hops which he sold for 85 cents per pound. This attracted attention to the industry and resulted in further planting, first along the Puyallup river and afterward in the numerous rich alluvial valleys of Puget Sound basin and in Eastern Washington. From this small beginning sprang an industry that has brought into the state more than twenty millions of dollars and given employment to fully fifteen thousand people annually. Every succeding year has witnessed an increase in production, culminating in a crop of 50,000 bales, or nearly 9,000,000 pounds for the year 1890.

The remarkable increase in hop production in the state of Washington has been due entirely to the existing favorable conditions for the development of this branch of agriculture. The deep, moist, friable, rich soil; the cool nights, coupled with long days of sunlight; the certainty of summer rainfall; the ease with which the loamy land may be cultivated; the constant, continued growth, unchecked from drought, have all contributed to make the yield large, the cost light, the crop certain and the quality choice. The best and most productive hop lands must be selected only by practical experience. The bulk of the crop of Western Washington is at present grown in the valleys of the White, Puyallup. Stuck, Skagit and Snohomish rivers and on the Dungeness bottoms. In Eastern Washington where the climate is more like that of New York, success has attended the efforts of the hop farmers of the Yakima valley where the acreage is constantly increasing. Experience may demonstrate that hop culture would be a profitable industry over a large part of the area of Western Washington, provided there was a market for the crops. From the Cascades and the Olympics spring many streams forming rich valleys adjacent to tidewater. For countless centuries has the silt been coming down from the mountain sides, and the process still goes on, vegetable growth springing up and taking possession of the newly-made land. This rich alluvial deposit is inexhaustible and the hop roots penetrate deep into the soil to absorb the moisture. Some yeaas ago I attempted to sink an artesian well on my hop farm, and I found the soil to be 144 feet deep. In ditching we found the hop roots abundant at four feet from the surface, and roots nine feet long have been exposed by the wash of the river.

How long hops will flourish in any one yard in such soil, no man can guess, but if the land is well selected, the soil carefully prepared and the yard carefully cultivated, there is no reason why even centuries of successful crops should lead to any material diminuation of the yield. There are in Washington hop yards a quarter of a century old without missing a hill or sign of decay. Mr. Morton, in his treatise on hop culture, in speaking of England, mentions a hop yard that has been in uninterrupted cultivation for 300 years. He writes: "The durability of the hop plant is very great when growing upon congenial soil with careful cultivation. It is difficult to ascertain the age of particular plantations. We have one, however, in our possession which has not been replanted for at least one hundred and fifty years, and it is as flourishing as ever." Certainly the soil of Washington is capable of yielding successive crops and in the light of an experience of twenty-five years and in view of the inherent characteristics of soil and climate, it is incredible that there should be a crop failure. Of the quality of Washington hops it is unnecessary to say much. Their excellence is well attested by the growing favor with which they are received in the world's markets. In all quotations of prices they stand in the front rank and compete with those of New York growth, while the abundant crops and smaller cost of production have forced many of the eastern growers to reduce their acreage and have forced the abandonment of several thousand of acres in England.

Within the limits of space to which I am confined in this article, it would be impossible to give a comprehensive idea of the methods of planting, cultivating, harvesting and curing. At best I can give but an outline. For many years in succession I have harvested full crops from cuttings planted in the early spring. To insure this sod ground is selected and double plowed. Where but one pole to the hill is intended, the plants should be seven feet apart, set in squares. If the ground has been properly prepared the planting is speedily done. From three to five cuttings are planted in each hill to insure a crop the first year. Sometimes double hills a foot apart are planted and the pole set between them the first year, after which half of the plants are ploughed or grubbed out. Every one hundredth hill is reserved for the staminate plant, though I believe that a less number of staminate hills would be desirable, and possibly none would be better. All vines that appear early in the season are trained the first year. Nothing is required but to keep the ground well cultivated by frequent plowing and harrowing, and to keep the hills free from weeds and grass by hand culture. Cultivation after the second year is more expensive, when grubbing is required, but after a yard is thoroughly established it would seem that no amount of ill-treatment would kill or subdue it. Deep culture up to the time the bloom appears is attended by best results. After that the road is blocked by the arms reaching across the rows and interlocking, until there is a perfect canopy of vines, and the surface of the ground becomes matted with fine rpots that shoot up to the surface and are so numerous that a pin could hardly be stuck into the ground without encountering one. Training requires constant vigilance, in order that each pole may be stocked with the requisite number of vines, and that the excess of vines that take to the poles may be fought down.

Hop-picking is one of the picturesque scenes of Washington. The work of harvesting is done principally by Indians who come from all parts of the state, from British Columbia, and even from Alaska. It is the time of the year when the Indian is sure to work sufficient to enable him to buy his winter stores. Most of them reach the hop yards in their canoes, which, hewn from single logs, seem clumsy and unsafe to the white man, but in which the Indians brave even the tempests of the ocean. Hundreds and even thousands of these canoes in the early autumn are to be seen on the waters of Puget Sound and the beaches are covered with temporary camps. From the shores of the Pacific of British Columbia and beyond, whole tribes embark, pass through the Gulf of Georgia and across the Strait of Fuca, and paddle up the Sound for the sole purpose of being present at the hop picking and spending the money earned in blankets and gandy calico and other stores to last until the next season of plenty. Men, women and even children

RIVERS ON A TEAR.

U. S. Mail Lost—Dan Pullen's Hard Fight With Raging Waters—A Hard Loss.

BEAVER, Nov. 10,—[Special]—Thursday afternoon as the mail-carrier reached Lake creek, (on his trip from La Push to Pysht) he found the little creek wild, but it being a small stream, he forced his ponies into it. One made the crossing, but the other, being a new horse on the trail, was carried down the stream, striking a float log across the creek and was drawn under the log. The horn of the saddle caught the cinch and was broken, casting saddle, mail-sacks and the balance of the pack adrift. The horse, after freeing himself of the saddle drifted a short way down the stream and was pulled ashore. A searching party was sent at once to try and recover the mail-sack, which is said to contain valuable registered matter, but nothing could be found but a valise and one or two saddle blankets.

Dan Pullen, of La Push, came very near losing one of his fine horses at the same place and time. It took all the courage and muscle of the attendants to land them, one of which was washed down and under the same log.

News has just reached here that James Carson, the invincible Clallam Bay packer, lost a fine grey colt in Pysht River at the crossing above Erickerson's Friday, while en route from Clallam Bay to Beaver. Rivers and creeks are all very high and dangerous. It has been raining steadily for the past ten days with no signs of a let-up.

AN INTERESTING TRIP.

"The Democrat" Sends an Agent Through the Quillayute Country

THE HOP GARDENS.

Some of the Finest Timber and Water Facilities in the State—The Eden of Washington—The Lakes and Forests Abound With Game.

To one who has not taken it, a trip to the Quillayute country from Port Angeles is a revelation. Your correspondent had but a faint conception of the great and varied resources of Clallam county until recently, in the interest of THE DEMOCRAT, made a trip to that, the best portion of our great county.

A Short description of that country, and the experience obtained by a visit there cannot help but interest many of THE DEMOCRAT readers.

Leaving Port Angeles on the good ship Hermosa, your correspondent arrived at Pysht at 6 o'clock p. m., of the same day; there I stopped at the Pysht Hotel which is under the management of our Commissioner, John Gordon. This point is at present the gateway of the famous Quillayute country—the pack trains and mail carrier all start from this point on Tuesdays and Saturdays of each week for various points in the Quillayute Valley. On leaving Pysht, the objective point is Beaver post office which is 20 miles distant. It is considered one day's travel. The trail follows the Pysht river up to Burnt Mountain, through the beautiful Pysht Valley, which is thickly timbered with gigantic trees of the fir, spruce and hemlock varieties. You leave the river at Burnt mountain, and follow the divide along the mountain. After crossing Burnt mountain you descend into a valley and then make the ascent of a second mountain. The trail in some places leading over narrow and dangerous ledges. At theso points you seem to be walking in mid air, as a false step would hurl you down the mountain side to everlasting eternity. The pack train drivers tell of a number of incidents when horses have been percipated to the gulch below by a mistep. Descending this mountain you arrive at a ranch, known as the fifteen mile house, owned and conducted by Henry Welsh, where the weary correspondent stops and is regailed by a dinner of finest mountain trout, taken from Beaver Lake which adjoines the ranch. This is a most beautiful little lake about one half mile in width and about the same in length. Leaving the fifteen mile-house you follow along the Beaver river about three miles when the rumbling of water fall upon your ears and on following a trail which leads towards the sound you emerge on the river bank in front of the Beaver Falls; the total fall of water here is about 60 feet and will furnish unlimited water power for the operating of saw mills and other factories, here on the banks of the river in this beautiful and romatic spot, Mr. E. F. Corliss has erected a very comfortable house and taken up the ranch through which the beautiful Beaver Falls flow. Emerging from the woods about 3 miles distant you behold Beaver Prairie, which is a beautiful stretch of country containing about 640 acres of land. Here is a store run by Mr. M. V. B. Lamoreux, who also conducts the Beaver hotel where the correspondent stops for the night.

Leaving Beaver in the morning, the trail follows the course of the Solduck river. A journey of three miles over a passable trail brings you to Lake Prairie; here Mr. J. E. Higgins conducts a store and boarding house; here also is a beautiful lake abounding with trout. From there, the trail leads past numerous small prairies to Shuwah. Here Mr. Jacob Fossel runs a store and has charge of the post office, and has a very fine ranch of the finest prairie bottom land.

Leaving Shuwah, and following the trail about three miles you reach the ranch of Mr. Austin on the bank of the Solduck river. Mr. Austin conducts a ferry over the raging Solduck for the accommodation of travelers. Crossing the Solduck the trail leads you through a belt of the finest timber to the Kalawa river; here is another ferry conducted by Mr. Duning.. Following the trail three miles further you come to the famous Forks Prairie; here is a stretch of land about four miles long and containing about 1,700 acres of the finest agricultural land in the State of Washington. This beautiful prairie lies between the forks of the Kalawa and Bogacheil rivers hence the name Forks Prairie. The soil is wonderfully rich and produces enormous crops of hops, potatoes, oats, hay, fruits and all varities of vegetables; here Mr. J. E. Crawford and M. Whilen have fine hop gardens, the production of which stands at the head of the hop market. The farmers here are in a most thrifty and excelent condition, with good houses and farm buildings, fine droves of thrifty looking cattle and horses. During my stay at Forks I took the opportunity to visit the Indian camp at Shalah, named after the chief, or in other words, as he was introduced to the correspondent, the Mayor of the town. The camp is situated on the banks of the Bogacheil river, where the Indians have a novel fish trap erected for the purpose of catching salmon. The trap is composed of poles driven into the river in such a way as to form a dam with the exception of a space in the center of the river, there the wily Indian sets his trap or net, which is of a funnel shape composed of ordianry seine twine. The amount of fish caught in this manner by the Indians is astonishing; they sometimes secure a canoe full of salmon of

RADICALS IN CONTROL.

The defeat in Ohio is not without its hopeful side. The election of McKinley, the idol apostle of the protected barons, means in a fuller sense, that hereafter McKinleyism is Republicanism. The bourbons in the party have control.

The Reed-McKinley-Lodge school have the direction of the party policy, and if the Blaine-Frye-Butterfield school expect any favors they must bow in submission to these ultra bourbon radicals. Reciprocity is from this time on, the small end of the McKinley bill. All that is now formidable about James G. Blaine is his personality, otherwise he is a much smaller man in his party than McKinley or Reed or Lodge or any one of a half a dozen others.

It was the triumph of these radicals in congress last summer that gave the Democracy a majority of two to one in the next House—that gave them the great West, including Wisconsin, Iowa, Michigan and Illinois and such splendid gains in the east, especially in Massachusetts last year. It was this, more or less directly, that has again given the Democrats Massachusetts and Iowa. Their continued success, although Ohio is lost, will give the Democracy, without much doubt, Massachusetts, Wisconsin and Iowa, and without any doubt, Connecticut, Indiana, most of Michigan, New Jersey, New York and a Democratic president next year.

WASHINGTON AND CHILE.

No section of the United States would be more sensibly affected by an eruption between this government and Chile, than that which Washington would experience.

The lumber trade of Washington with Chile is of such immense proportion that owing to the late internal trouble in Chile this industry during the season just passed received the greatest set-back it has ever known and chiefly to this cause may be attributed the shutting down of the many saw-mills of the Sound, which were inoperative the greater part of the season.

With the overthrow of Balmaceda, and the establishment of peace in the realm of our best customer, we had allowed ourselves to indulge the hope that the commercial relations between Puget Sound, and this important South American republic would be opened in the spring with renewed vigor, but since Chile has so grossly insulted this government, and seems to connive at the assasination of our seamen, we find that we would rather fight than trade, and believing that only cowards can preach longer forbearance with that small country, which is all long and no width.

WE do not know whether we have done the county commissioners an injustice or not in attributing to them an organ, but the Tribune speaks authoratively about their desires and motives. If it is correct, the county commissioners may well say "Oh God deliver us from our friends."

IT will require the official canvass before it is definitely known how the New York legislature stands. The associated press makes it a tie. Governor Hill says the Democrats will control both houses. Governor Hill knows a good deal about New York.

"THE SCHOLAR IN POLITICS."

THE POST-INTELLIGENCER continues its indecent attack upon our dead heroes. The admirers of Webster, Everett, Sumner, Charles Francis Adams and Bowles are now made to weep on account of its invective. The graveyard seems to be that blackguardly organ's prefered battlefield. Not altogether unnaturally so, however, as it is a relic of the old-time Thad Stevens school, whoes ideas of political economy were quietly laid to rest in the graveyard of exploded theories by the thinking classes a generation ago. As so with that class of bourbons, who never think, but are guided entirely by their prejudices, its only recourse is to vent its spleen upon our colleges and their scientific thinkers. In a depreciating manner it refers to the "scholar in politics" as one to be detested. Its course, vulgar mind seems to find its idol in the practical politician of the Clancy & Burns stripe. Of such, now, are too many of the leaders in its party that once, not entirely without cause, prided itself that America's learning was with it. The Post-Intelligencer, be it said to its credit, however, is not so bad in this respect as some in its party. Unlike J. Sloat Fassett, who is a college-bred man from whom better could be expected, but who in the recent campaign in New York City, to stand in with the voter, spent his evenings in saloons and theaters of a low grade, and at banquets, to catch the Dutch, put aside the water he prefered and drank beer, after having taken his coat and collar off to show that he was not "stuck up," the Post-Intelligencer is naturally low. It does not have to descend as did the schollary Fassett. As was the result in New York, will it be elsewhere. The Post-Intelligencer will profit naught by its indecency.

THE Presbytery which assembled Nov. 3 in Brooklyn to try Charles A. Briggs, D. D., for heresy, has dismissed the case; the vote standing 94 to 39 in his favor.

THE organ of the board of county commissioners arises and explains the commissioners' mysterious action about county taxes. It was done for the sake of their party, if not for their own personal good. According to that paper the first duty of the commissioners is to look out for their own personal good, of next importance is the welfare of their party. We somehow got an idea that the people and the taxpayers ought to come in in this taxation question some place; but then, we are not used to Republican politics.

IF Blaine does not prove a whale too big for McKinley's little tub, he will have to shrink even more than he did when he wrote that letter "explaining" all about that "market for another bushel of wheat or barrel of pork."

MCKINEY's success will prove a white elephant in the Republican camp before another year closes. The farmers in the great Mississippi valley will want a market for at least "another bushel of wheat or a barrel of pork."

OUR article on the Quillayute country in this issue is interesting reading. The Quillayute country needs but an outlet to become the richest farming district west of the Sound.

EZRA MEEKER's article on hop culture appears in this issue. This will interest many of our readers, Clallam county is going to be one of the greatest hop producing sections in the world in the near future.

A street-car conductor beat his wife, and she got even with him by showing that he was also beating the company. In the eyes of the law it is a much more serious thing to beat a railroad company than to beat a wife.

CITY POLITICS.

Second Ward Caucus — Candidates for City Council in the Field.

The city political pot has commenced to bubble. Dodgers were got out Monday calling a mass meeting of the electors of the second ward for Tuesday night to nominate three councilmen and to "set the political ball to rolling." A good crowd assembled about 8 o'clock and was called to order by D. P. Quinn, who stated the object of the meeting. Donald McInnes was then elected chairman and R. A. Grimes secretary. Eight names were placed in nomination for the three councilmen. John W. Troy, James F. Meagher and Willard Brumfield were selected from the eight as the meeting's choice for the positions. The meeting then adjourned.

Wednesday a petition was filed with the city clerk for the nomination of D. P. Quinn for councilman at large.

Stephen Land, J. W. Stewart, F. R. Thompson, Dr. F. S. Lewis and others are mentioned as probable councilmen from the first ward. It is also thought that the first ward people will have a candidate for councilman-at-large.

For mayor there are apparently candidates in plenty. The names of Thomas Malony, N. R. Smith and S. P. Carusi are all mentioned as probable candidates.

Thomas Malony thus far seems to be the favorite. It is urged that he has a good record as councilman and being thoroughly acquainted with city affairs is fully competent to advise the council.

GROVELAND CITY.

Notes From Dungeness—A Horse Race—Society Notes.

DUNGENESS, Nov. 12, 1891.—[Special.]—The Groveland City Land Company has let a contract to C. C. Bowman & Co., to build the wharf at the new city. The wharf will be about three-fourths of a mile long and the water will be fifteen feet deep at low tide.

The Elwha River Up.

The hard rains for the last week have caused the Elwha to raise far above the normal state. Sunday the lower portion of the river broke through a slough running through the farm of M. D. The river is running near his residence now. It is also reported that the river is undermining the pier of the bridge being built by the Burlingame Contract Co., and that some of the material has met a similar fate to that of Mr. Gleason's cabbages.

THE SHADOW SOCIAL.

Miss Emma Fenn Takes the Cake—Little Jack and Miss Hansen a Success.

Did you say, what kind of a time did we have at the Shadow Social?

Well I would say we had a fine time—everybody well pleased.

Part first, under the charge of Prof. Main, was well executed; the music by Beardsley orchestra was perfect.

The children of the Reserve school did themselves credit, showing that great care had been excercised by their teacher in preparing them.

The Swedish quartette was fine, showing that they had sang often together. The grand march was well executed by Mr. McLennan, who favored the audience with a scottish bag pipe solo and played in original Scottish style, pleasing the audience. The crowning piece was by little Jack and Miss Hansen. The children dressed and acting as little darkeys, did act so well that everybody roared with merriment, and shouted themselves hoarse.

Part Second, was taken charge of by Mr. Lasley, who proceeded to auction off the shadows, and perfect satisfaction prevailed. After luncheon was over a beautiful cake was voted to Miss Emma Fenn, as the hansomest lady, and the audience decided that Brother Sam Johnson was the homliest man, and presented him with a fine cake. After the successful social was over, which netted about $25, the floor was cleared and a couple of hours was spent dancing to some of the finest music in Port Angeles.

A PIONEER STEAMER.

She was the First Steamer to Enter the Golden Gate—The Crew Refuses to Work and Asks to Be Discharged—Collector Bickford Endeavors to Pacify Them.

The Bark California, of San Francisco, from Saluvery, Peru, arrived in the harbor last Friday to await orders from San Francisco and seems to be having some trouble with her crew, who refuse to do duty on the ground that their voyage is ended with the return of the bark to an American port, they having shipped in San Francisco for Saluvery, Peru, and return, and now demand their pay and discharge. Captain E. S. Morine claims that he cannot pay and discharge the men at this port, or muster them out of the bark's service, on account of this ceremony having to be performed before a shipping commissioner, and there is no such office at this port. Collector Bickford was applied to to render assistance in adjusting the differences between the captain and crew, and when the law is explained to the men in regard to the mustering out of service before a shipping commissioner, it is probable that they will take their ship inio Port Townsend, which is the first port having the required officer, and then their quarrel may be ended.

The California is a non-chartered vessel owned in San Francisco, and was at one time a United States cruiser, with side wheels. Becoming rather out of date, and useless in the naval service, she was sold by the government. The purcheser removing her machinery she was transformed into a bark.

Later informantion was obtained by a DEMOCRAT representative in regard to the troubled condition of affairs on board the bark California, who accompanied Collector Bickford on board. Immediately upon the arrival of the Collector on board, Morine had the dissatisfied men called aft, and told them that, as there was no shipping commissioner in this port, the collector was the nearest approach to that officer with which he could supply them, and that they could unreservedly state their greviences to him, which they did in a very few words. They were not dissatisfied in any way with their treatment on board; were not afraid of being carried against their will to some foreign port by the bark's expected orders, and as the bark has only her ballast on board, they had no dread of discharging her cargo. In short, they wanted only an immediate discharge and payment for their services, that they might engage in the more pleasing task of "blowing" This Captain Morine refused from two considerations: First, his responsibility for their safty does not end until he is ordered by the shipping commissioner to discharge them; second, his ship is left by his crew in a most deplorable condition, to correct which he has not sufficient men aboard exclusive of the disgruntled element. The anchor is fouled; a broken spar is lying on deck; ropes and chains are scattered around in confusion, among which may be seen several barrels of beef, and other provisions, presenting a scene of perfect disorder which one day's work would entirely efface. The mainsail lies like a wet rag on the cabin roof, slowly rottening from want of a few minutes sunshine or a breath of air to dry it.

Mr. Bickford told them they could not be discharged here, and exhaustively explained the reason why such was the case, after which the Captain asked them if they were satisfied and would return to work. Much to the surprise of the visitors, the crew of six forecastle hands still refused, and reiterated their demand for a commissioner.

The bark is certainly in a position of some danger from the fouled anchor, which is a menance to her hull, to be realized, the heavy swells of a few days ago is only necessary, in which case only a few rolls would cause it to break a hole in her bow.

The California was one of the United States ninety days steam cruisers during the late war, and was the first steamer to cross the bar at the entrance to San Francisco harbor in '49. She is built of solid live oak, and though now an old vessel, the general good build will give her good rating for many years yet. The California is owned by M. Richard, of San Francisco, and will probably be ordered up Sound for lumber. She left Calivery Sept. 17th, and had a fair passage until off Cape Flattery when she laid to for eight days in rough weather, before she could enter the Straits.

A QUEER COUNTRY TRULY.

Hans Endrichkeit Came to the Conclusion that he Wasn't in It.

Hans Friedrich Endrichkeit arrived in this city a few days ago by one of the Hamburg-American Packet Company's steamers, says the New York World. He was on his way to visit his sister, who is the wife of a banker in Boston. It was the first time Hans had set foot on American soil, and he found everything very strange. He set sail on the steamer Pilgrim Monday evening for Fall River. His ticket entitled him to berth 103 on the steerage deck.

Hans had a hearty dinner aboard the steamer and spent the evening with his pipe on the upper deck. About 10 o'clock he decided to turn in for the night. In the main saloon he found a door numbered 103 and supposed it led to his sleeping apartment. He turned the knob and entered.

The stateroom in question had been engaged by a young couple who were returning from their wedding tour. The husband had left his wife to retire while he had a good-night cigar in the open air. When Hans Endrichkeit entered, therefore, he was somewhat surprised to find a young woman in the lower bunk of his apartment. She was sleeping soundly. Her diamond bracelet and a tiny gold watch were on the dresser and her dress adorned the back of a chair.

"This is a remarkable country," said Hans to himself, as he added his big silver watch to the other jewelry. "I s'pose the last one in fastens the door," and he turned the brass key quietly. In a few minutes he was in the upper bunk, sleeping as peacefully as the young woman in the cot below.

There came a rap at the door Hans was snoring, but the young woman awoke.

"Who's there?" she enquired.

"It's me," replied a familiar voice ungrammatically.

Then the bride discovered Hans' clothing and gave a scream that was heard from one end of the main saloon to the other. Passengers poked their heads from their staterooms and wondered what was the matter. The instant the door of No. 103 was unlocked, the frantic husband jumped in and seized poor, inoffensive Hans. He draged him from his bunk, and after pounding him soundly threw him bodily into the saloon. He was about to follow up his attack with a chair when when Captain Davis and Detective Agnew appeared on the scene and interfered. They hurried Hans into cover and then sent back for his clothes. He was a very battered frightened passenger who was conducted to bunk No. 103 in the steerage.

The angry bridegroom apologized for his violence when he learned how Hans had made his mistake. The latter still beleives that this is a remarkable country.

HOP CULTURE.

just able to walk engage in the work and are all industrious as long as the season lasts. Their painted faces and bright raiment in contrast among the dark foliage of the hop vines form a picture that is ever new. And when the harvest is over, they return to their homes by easy stages, taking care that much of the bright silver is well expended or gambled away before civilization is left behind.

As to the problem of harvesting as the production increases, I can only repeat what I have written before. If ever there was cause for anxiety the hop growers of Washington have it when harvest time approaches, The question of questions with the hop growers is, will pickers enough come? If so, will they arrive in time? From a supposed short supply of help timid growers will become scared and begin to bid up and run after fresh arrivals. The Indians are quick to perceive the situation and ready to profit by the anxiety of the growers, and to drive the best bargain possible. They are masters of the situation, or think they are, and oftentimes there is much trouble and expense incurred from the scramble among growers to procure pickers. As the acreage has increased, however, the supply of labor has thus far been ample, so that there never has been any real loss from lack of pickers. In later years numerous white hop pickers have entered into competiton with the Indians, and now it is no uncommon sight to see both picking in the same field, and maybe from the same row of hops. I had myself one year 140 white pickers out of a total of 400.

The profits realized from the careful cultivation of hops in Washington are large. The average yield of hops in New York and in the hop districts of England and Germany is not more than 650 pounds to the acre, while the average of Washington hops is 1,600 pounds to the acre. I have harvested 168 tons off 170 acres, and in several instances coming within my own personal knowledge over 4,000 pounds per acre have been harvested.

The cost of producing hops in New York is not less than fifteen cents a pound and in England an average of at least eighteen cents per pound is reached. In the state of Washington the average cost is less than ten cents per pound, so that Washington hop farmers often sell at a profit while others producing at a higher cost are selling at a loss. For five years from 1886 to 1890 inclusive, I have kept accurate account of the production of one farm of sixty-one acres which I have in hops. During this time there were grown and marketed 574,602 pounds of hops, which sold at an average of 17 3-5 cents per pound, aggregating $101,129.95. The cost of production was nine cents per pound, or $51,714.18. The net profit, therefore, from sixty-one acre for five years was $49,415.77, an annual average of $9,883,15, and a yearly average net profit per acre of $162.02.

The improvements on the hop farms of Washington are the best to be found on the globe. I have seen the oasts of England, the numerous make-shifts of New York, the good but not equal appliances of California, and the less complete fixtures of Oregon, but it remains for Washington still to stand at the front in being the best prepared of any to handle the crop. I have this year introduced the electric light in one group of kilns, undoubtedly the first instance of the kind ever practiced, and the time may not be far distant when the curing of the crop will be carried on by the same process, thus insuring uniformity of heat, a smaller expense and a minimum risk from fire.

Concerning the crop of 1891 I would best repeat what I said in a bulletin to the trade issued September 25: "We selected and picked separately the yield off 816 hills of hops growing on a compact lot of ground of the Puyallup Hop Company's yard at Kent, and obtained 124 boxes of hops, which weighed 24 pounds of cured hops per box. The hills of hops are seven feet apart with but two vines to the pole and one pole to the hill. It takes 889 hills to make an acre. At the rate this compact block of land consisting of 816 hills, yielded, an acre would yield 5692 pounds of dry hops.

"Knowing that the yield was enormous and that this statement might be questioned, I have taken especial pains to prevent any mistake. One man was especially detailed to keep the account as the hops were picked, reporting meanwhile to Mr. Arthur Titus, of Kent who was the field superintendent, and who makes affidavit as to the correctness of the count of boxes. I can myself certify to the area of the land. No extra care of these hops was taken, nor was there any fertilizing material used. This is the greatest yield on record, and entitles Washington to be known as the banner hop district of the world, and the Puyallup Hop company as having produced the largest yield on record for a single acre, and a further record of having just harvested 126 tons off 125 acres.

the finest variety, some of which weigh between 50 and 60 pounds, at one drawing of the net, which they sell to the white settlers and smoke for their own winter use. While there the correspondent was treated to a very novel and pleasing entertainment by the Mavor of the town of Shalah, which began by having a young Indian brave give us, a company of three, a canoe ride on the raging waters of the Bogacheil river. It is marvelous how dexterously the Indian can handle a canoe on the raging mountain stream; you think you are about to be dashed against the rock-bound shore by the wild turbulent current when coming around the sharp curves in the river, but the Indian, with one swoop of his pole, turns the canoe's head to the center of the stream with unerring accuracy.

The next number on the program was a canoe race between two little Indian boys in their little canoes. The little braves entered the race with as much enthusiasm as their older brothers, splashing the water with a vengeance and giving vent to their numerous Indian whoops of excitement.

The last number on the program was a wrestling match between two of the older braves, which proved very exciting and in which much skill was shown.

But the most novel feature witnessed by the correspondent during his visit to the Indian camp, was the manner in which one of the braves was being treated for rheumatism, which was as follows: The effected parts being the lower limbs, the Indian medicine man, with a red hot iron about ½ inch in diameter, burned four holes about 1½ inches in depth in the affected parts. The patient is then held, with the affected parts exposed, before a very hot fire until all the feeling has disapeared from them; then the treatment is over, and awaits for the cure which they claim is successful and absolute. The manner of application of these heated brands is as follows, and the unflinching stoicism of the Indian patient was heroic beyond description. The medicine man having heated the iron to a fusible condition, applied it to the affected parts of the patient, who bore the application of the burning brand without flinching or giving any outward indication of the suffering he endured, other than a guttural grunt. The patient sat erect on a fallen log unattended, save by the medicine man, and evidently seemed to enjoy the singeing process and the aroma that arose from his burning flesh.

Before leaving the Indian camp the correspondent received an invitation to attend an Indian dance, in which the squaws and children participate as well as the braves, which was to occur in the the evening of the next day, but, as the correspondent had made arrangements to start on the return journey the following day, it was impossible for him to attend.

The following morning found the worthy representative of THE DEMOCRAT wending his way over the trail, en route for Pysht, which point he reached the following evening without a notable incident.

Leaving Pysht the following afternoon on the Hermosa for Clallam Bay, which place was reached at 6 p. m. that day. Clallam Bay is a new town with bright prospects for a prosperous future.

During my stay at Clallam Bay I met and formed the acquainiance of two notable characters, who were introduced to me as Josh, from Missouri, and his professional pard, whose acquaintance proved a most enjoyable companionship, and whose unexhaustable supply of wit and humor added much to the occasion.

The following Monday afternoon found the correspondent, grip in hand, again standing on the deck of the repeated good ship Hermosa, waving farewell to his friend Josh, from Missouri, and his professional pard, who stood shedding tears until the wharf was submerged and they were compelled to seek safety in the hospitable apartments of the Ocean View Hotel.

The following morning Port Angeles the Cherboerg of America, was reached and the correspondent, although glad to get home, was more than pleased with the country he had visited, and the acquaintances he had formed, and he could but predict the brightest future for it all.
