THE POME

In the far north-western county. In the land of giant fir trees Near the bay named by the Spanish Port or Haven of the angels Lived a brown-haired, blue-eyed maiden, With her parents in the forest. Peaceful was her life as dreamland. Peaceful as the gentle moonlight Or the sunshine on the hill slopes All around her father's cottage. Thus she dwelt and passed her girlhood, Often wand'ring through the forest

Dreaming day-dreams of the future, Wishing often, scarcely thinking What she wished or what she hoped for, Never daring to confess it To her inmest heart in secret That her thoughts were often turning To the advent of some hero, Unknown prince or incognito.

Who should change her airy castles Into something more substantial. By and by her patient waiting Was rewarded to the fullest For the magic wand of Progress Waved o'er forest, bay and hilltop; Then a growing busy city sprang up while the forest vanished And the blind god made a hero. Of a tall and stalwart neighbor. All the rest may now be guessed at, All the moonlight walks and boatrides; And the story may be ended with the statement that "they're married" And her former name of Haynes is Nowtranslated to McLaughlin.
